Quit India Movement day is observed every year on 8 August. Mahatma Gandhi delivered his famous speech "Do or Die" during the Bombay session of the All-India Congress Committee (INC) on 8 August 1942.

In the following article, we will discuss the history, causes and outcome of the Quit India Movement. We will also discuss what happened on Quit India Movement Day 2023.

History of the Quit India Movement

After the British failed to obtain Indian support for the British war effort through the Cripps Mission, Gandhi issued an appeal to Do or Die at the Gowalia Tank Maidan in Bombay on August 9, 1942. The All India Congress Committee organized a huge protest, calling for 'an orderly British withdrawal' from India.

During the Quit India Movement, various violent incidents took place against the British regime. Numerous nationwide rallies and strikes were a part of the movement. One of the first widespread active participation in the movement came from individuals in India. Around Tens of thousands of leaders were detained by the British and held in prison until 1945. The liberation of imprisoned freedom fighters marked the end of the movement in 1945. Mukunda Kakati, Matangini Hazra, Kanaklata Barua, Kushal Konwar, Bhogeswari Phukanani, and others were martyrs in this freedom movement.

What caused the Quit India Movement?

The Cripps' March Mission (1942) and its failure influenced Gandhi's demand for The Quit India Movement. The Cripps' March Mission (1942) and its failure influenced Gandhi's demand for The Quit India Movement. A draft declaration of the British Government was given, which included elements such as the foundation of a Dominion, the formation of a Constituent Assembly, and the right of provinces to form independent constitutions. In response, Gandhi ji stated, 'It is a post-dated cheque on a crashing bank.'

Other factors were the threat of Japanese invasion in India and the national leaders' realization of the British inability to defend India. By 1939, India's north and east borders were being advanced upon by Japan, one of the Axis Powers that fought alongside the British against them in the Second World War. The communities of South-East Asia that the British had deserted were left in a perilous condition. This action did not instill much faith in the Indian public since they had doubts about the British government's ability to defend India against Axis attack.

Opposition to the Quit India Movement

It was opposed by a number of political organizations involved in the Indian Independence Movement. Hindu nationalist organizations, like the Hindu Mahasabha, publicly condemned and boycotted the Quit India Movement. Syama Prasad Mukherjee, the leader of the Hindu Mahasabha in Bengal, addressed a letter to the British Government outlining how they should react if the Congress called for the British rulers to leave India after the Hindu Mahasabha officially decided to boycott the Quit India movement. The princely states also opposed the movement and supported the opposition.

Outcome of the Quit India Movement

Over 100,000 people who participated in the movement were arrested. Hundreds of civilians were killed. When World War II was nearly over, the Labour Party of the United Kingdom won elections on the promise of granting India independence. Political prisoners who had been imprisoned were released in 1945. One of the movement's most significant accomplishments was keeping the Congress party unified through all of the subsequent difficulties and tribulations.
